As he comes down, it has been three days since he has eaten or slept. He is laying in a motel bed he doesn't remember going to. And yet even though his body cries out for food and sleep, Michael is just coming off a meth bender and there is only one thing on his mind: more.

The journey of Michael Dotts, although he is just in his mid-twenties, is long and full of extraordinary pain.

In fact, it is so extreme that you might believe that someone with his experiences always had a penchant for living on the edge. Brash. Hard. Throwing caution to the wind.

But that isn't the case.

Although Michael descended in to a hard-to-believe nightmare of drug abuse-requiring his body to hold up under remarkable strain, and his parents to hold up under unfathomable sorrow and fear-all that the man, who started out as a sweet, fourteen-year-old boy, was really after was to take the pain of a terrible memory and find a way to numb it.
