Greg Wright stood on the outskirts of the park, a basketball wedged between his arm and hip, and watched the pick-up game taking place on the basketball court. "These guys look pretty good," he thought to himself. The players occupying the courts had everything Greg looked for: height, speed and skill. If he was going to dominate, he wanted to play the best guys he could.

There's nothing like making really good guys look really bad. Finally he approached the court and when the guys saw him coming, their eyes lit up. Six-seven is an advantage no matter how you slice it. When he got in the game, he was being guarded by a tall guy with a solid build named Tex. A shot went up and Greg swooped in for the rebound, but instead of coming down with it, he decided to simply put it back up. Just then, Tex jumped to try to block Greg's shot.

With Tex and Greg's hands on opposite sides of the ball, Greg tried to push through the block. It was one of those rare moments in life when everything aligns perfectly—and Greg would never be the same again.
