The final stage of a person's life is usually a painful process for the family and friends of the dying. There are few among us who know exactly what to do, what to say, how to comfort.

And yet, while most of us are searching in vain for the right words or the proper way to touch, critical time is passing—time that could be spent blessing the dying in profound ways. If only we knew how.

When Rita Diaz simultaneously cared for two dying relatives, she got a sense that in doing so, she was fulfilling God's design for her. When she volunteered at a hospice facility, it was confirmed—she had found her purpose. Moved to take action, she asked her supervisor, Trina Mojica to join her in forming a ministry that is today called A Time of Presence.
