ON the day that Greg Williams jumped into the bushes to avoid the police, something happened that never should have. His phone rang. He wasn't even sure how it could have. As a meth dealer and user, paranoia dictated that he lived life in the shadows—where ringers are on perpetual off.

When the cops heard the ring and pulled him out of the bushes, they did an old fashion beat down. Greg had been running through backyards after he had terrorized a man when a drug deal went south.

As he got perp-walked into jail, it was his eighth time behind bars. He was getting tired of it. Walking through the gates, he was chained to a guy with a lot of nervous energy named Chino. He thought that if you're chained, it meant you should chat. Greg didn't share that feeling.
