Loli was waiting for her next appointment to show up when she suddenly realized there was a large gap in her schedule. Her chair is routinely filled up for five hours straight. Ladies, young and old come to Loli to have their makeup done to perfection for the prom or a big date or a ball. On this day, however, there were three cancellations.

That's odd, she thought. Loli, colorful and eclectic, leads a Bible study on Monday nights for women called Daughters of the King. She thought that perhaps she could use this newly-created free time to prepare for the next one.

Just then, her assistant appeared at Loli's chair. "There's a walk-in," her assistant said. "Would you like to take her?" Loli peered around the corner. The girl looked to be around 13 years old. She didn't like putting makeup on girls that young. As she looked out of the window, she saw an elderly man hurry away. He had dropped the young girl off. She looked back at the girl who stood there alone. Loli thought about it for a moment.

"Show her back," she told her assistant.
