Savannah put her head on her mother's lap as they sat in the back seat of the family car and headed toward the hospital. Tears fell from Savannah's face onto the jeans her mother was wearing. Teri, herself crying, stroked her daughter's blonde locks. "Shhh, shhh," she whispered.

Donald, Savannah's father, was driving slowly and deliberately, his fingers gripping tightly the steering wheel. His face was also covered with tears.

Savannah wiped at her nose with a tissue and then folded it tightly in her hand. Teri wished that she could step inside her daughter's head and clear away all that must be exploding in her mind, the horror, the mistrust. She thought about how innocent Savannah was, just 15 years old. She wondered how her faith—a faith that always seemed a little tepid for her liking, was going to hold up now that Savannah's life, as she knew it, had been taken away.

Now, everything was different.
