Loli was waiting for her next appointment to show up when suddenly there was a large gap in her schedule. Her chair was routinely filled up for five hours straight. Ladies young and old came to Loli to have their makeup done to perfection for a prom or big date or ball. On this day, however, there were three cancellations.

That's odd, she thought.

Loli, colorful and eclectic, lead a Bible study on Monday nights for women called Daughters of the King. She thought that perhaps she could use this newly-created free time to prepare for the next one. Just then, her assistant appeared at Loli's chair. "There's a walk-in," her assistant said. "Would you like to take her?"

Loli peered around the corner. The girl looked to be around 13. She didn't like putting makeup on girls that young. As she looked out of the window, she saw an elderly man hurry away. It was apparent that he had dropped the young girl off. She looked back at the girl standing there alone. Loli thought about it for a moment.

"Show her back," she told her assistant. "This is Aurora," her assistant said as she walked Aurora toward Loli's chair. "Hey, dude!" Loli said, "How's it going?" "OK," Aurora said stiffly, her demeanor downcast. As she sat, Loli noticed something peculiar about her skin. Little tiny lines, almost like scars, covered her from her face to her ears, to her chest, on down to her arms, to the end of her finger tips to her legs and toes, perfectly spaced apart, all the same length—about a half-inch. She looked like she was covered in wallpaper.
