BY: DAVE FRANCO

The day the freelance job was to start was going to be a Friday, just two days away. On Thursday night, I borrowed a friend's car and drove it to visit another friend in Warwick, New York—about an hour's drive upstate. The entire time, I felt lighter than air. I couldn't get the smile off my face.

When I returned to Manhattan late that night, I parked along a street in a nearby neighborhood. The following morning, I was up early with my plan laid out clearly in my mind: I was to walk to the neighborhood where the car was, return it to my friend, and then take the subway for the first day of my two-week job. I couldn't wait to get there.

Arriving at the corner that Friday morning, I saw nothing that looked remotely similar to the car that I had driven the night before. I ran to other corners of the neighborhood thinking—hoping that perhaps I had forgotten which corner I had parked.
